The report will be presented on Thursday to Judge Stanley R. Chesler of Federal District Court in Newark, who is presiding over the settlement of a class-action lawsuit brought by Children's Rights, a Manhattan advocacy group, on behalf of foster children in New Jersey.

Susan Lambiase, the associate director of Children's Rights, said the state was fixing the agency as a first step toward actually making things better for children in their daily lives.

One should start to see, by the middle end of next year, on-the-ground improvements for kids, she said. The department is doing what they're supposed to be doing so far, but it's no time to rest on their laurels.

Cecilia Zalkind, executive director of the Association for Children of New Jersey, said her group was pleased with the improvements in staffing and adoptions, and by the reduction of the notorious backlog in the unit that investigates charges of abuse of children in the state's custody.

In reality, they're not simply fixing the system; in many ways they're rebuilding it, she said, adding that the association was preparing a report about how long children remained in state custody, how often siblings were kept together and how often children were abused while placed outside their home.

This is still a fragile, volatile system, and the urgency for reform remains, she said. This effort has to be supported, and continue to be supported, especially with regard to funding, when Governor Corzine has proposed budget cuts across all departments.

In a statement yesterday, Gov. Jon S. Corzine praised the effort of the state's child welfare system.

Looking ahead, Ms. Lambiasesaid of state officials, They ve done a lot of hard work, and they ve done it well, but the hardest part is still in front of them, unfortunately.
