

Welcome Guest

Login | Register

pressofAtlanticCity.com

This is for personal, noncommercial use only.

To search archives, visit pressofatlanticcity.com/archives

Politicians find 'women's vote' not so simple

By IIIJET FLETCHER, Staff Writer, 609-777-7251 | Posted Wednesday, September 20, 2000

Call it "The Sisterhood of the Traveling Pols."

In less than a week, the two leading candidates for governor have crunched women's vote as a main item of their agenda.

campaign ads that needed his position on providing health care to...

WOUND TO FIGHT BACK - WITH NEW ADS AND A CHARTY OUTREACH STRATEGY.

WY... THE KEY TO WINNING THE NEW JERSEY GOVERNORIAL RACE...

Democratic Party base. A recent poll conducted Sept. 15-17 by the William I. Upsher Center for Public Policy at Richard Stockton College found that women expressed more support for Christie than for Christie.

So at a library in Camden County on Monday night, the Republican challenger said he wanted to Someone bought donuts and others wondered whether the night promised less political discovery and more of a social...

But Jane Russell knew where this was going

The 87-year-old from Gloucester Township used to work as a doctor. Whether remembering the price heaped periodically by politicians on health professionals...

present not to write off all politicians as the same. Russell stuck her hand in the air,

"I've said that!" she yelled. "I've been the one saying that!"

"When you get to my age, you feel you've heard all of this before," said Christie.

But what demographics fail to show is that the profile of a female voter need not always be up simply, nor pandered to.

In more ways than one, Christie also could find later that his Connecticut campaign a can of if not urban angst, then at least passion directed squarely at him by the choosing instead universal issues: unemployment, health coverage and education.

Casèle Love thought she knew why.

"Women, I'd say, are the barometers," she said. "We hear the husband's gripes, and the children's thoughts and feelings. So we know what's going on in the neighborhood."

Christie, chugging bottled water after the two-hour question-and-answer session, said that despite attacks by Corzine about mammogram coverage, he had not palled on women voters' intentions.

He said he preferred "to go with my gut" and schedule the campaign in the state. But having collected local female voters for a chat, he seemed happy to admit they were as varied as anyone else in their outlook.

"We heard about everything from pensions to job security to health care to taxes," he said.

He wasn't alone in his gallantry.

"Women care about exactly the same issues as men - they just discuss them in a language they're comfortable with," state Sen. Loretta Weinberg, D-Bergen, Corzine's running mate, said Tuesday. She said Christie's come over trying to "hook away" from their political base on health coverage.

And from Chris Daggett: "Ultimately I believe men and women have the same interest in making this state a better state." The issue about mammogram coverage, he said, was an immediate issue.

But to anyone still bent on wooing female voters, there's a further wrinkle.

Audi Dillard, 52, wanted to put three points to Christie: She watched her husband taught in public schools.

But Jean Morschauser, 78, left without asking a question. Now retired, she had worked in her husband's dental office. Her generation grew up with wildly different expectations than Blizzard's age did. As Morschauser put it while she put on her coat, the younger career women's concerns were as far from relevant to her own life as the gripes of a young, male go-getter.

"I'm old," she said flatly. "I'm not interested in the same things these young women are." She didn't take a doughnut.

For candidates, it's hard to travel with the sisterhood when the sisterhood doesn't travel.

E-mail Juliet Fletcher:

JFletcher@pressefac.com

© 1970-2009 Press of Atlantic City Media Group