election in which Christie, eyeing a presidential bid, was trying to rack up bipartisan support.

The state's conflict-of-interest law and ethics codes specify that state time and resources cannot be used in pursuit of political activities.

At a recent news conference, Christie said "clear instructions were sent throughout the administration that if you wanted to volunteer time for our campaign or for any other campaign . . . that that had to be done during your free time."

"I think those lines were fairly clear," he said.
