

He's former vice president and presumed Democratic presidential nominee Joe Biden who, in addition to the frustrations of home confinement, is tormented daily by published and broadcast reports suggesting that he's been weakened and should consider standing down rather than risk losing to President Trump.

While the misgivings and concerns expressed are often anonymous, others have spoken out publicly urging party leaders to reconsider in favor of a candidate they perceive to be stronger before time runs out.

When the coronavirus pandemic swept across the globe and forced a near halt to every phase of daily life in America, traditional political activity was an immediate casualty.

Gone were the barnstorming hop scotching national tours, the television coverage of adoring crowds trying to catch a glimpse of the candidate, the daily newspaper dispatches from the campaign press plane.

He likely won't benefit from a convention bump because there likely won't be a live conve

Biden must exercise caution, however, and avoid one of the more egregious errors committed by Clinton — a belief that Trump wouldn't be taken seriously by the American people and he'd self-destruct.

Well, today Trump is tweeting from the White House while Clinton communicates with her followers from
